program notes

George Frideric Handel (1685-1759)

George Frederic Handel was born in Halle, Germany, to a barber-surgeon father. Handel was a student of the keyboard arts and spent his early education learning from composer Friedrich W. Zachow. A man of many musical talents, he was a law student at the University of Halle, the organist of a Cathedral in Halle, and a violinist of the Halle Opera Orchestra. Alma mia is an aria from Handel's opera seria, a noble and serious style of Italian opera, Floridante, composed on December 9th, 1721. In the opera, Floridante sings Alma mia, while disguised as a slave in attempt to find his love, Elvira, and escape with her at the end of Act II.

Johannes Brahms (1833-1897)

Johannes Brahms was born in Vienna, Austria, in 1833 to a musical father. At age seven, Brahms showed signs of great piano abilities. By age 14, Brahms was performing small venues in and around Hamburg, raising money to help his family while composing. Brahms spent many years composing light works that transcended across several musical concentrations. From string quartets, vocal pieces and choral works, Brahms composed music with an ability to reach a multitude of Western music listeners. It was not until 1876 that he completed and debuted his first symphony, Symphony No. 1 in C minor, for fear of being compared to the great composers before him and not reaching their level of success. His first symphony was in fact, great, and was labeled "Beethoven's 10th Symphony." After the release of the first symphony, Brahms began to spread across Europe.

Gabriel Fauré (1845-1924)

Gabriel Fauré, a French composer from Pamiers, France, was born in 1845. His musical talent began to show at a very early age and was accepted as a student by Swiss composer Louis Niedermeyer. He also became a student of Camille Saint-Saëns, through whom he became acquainted with the compositions of great composers such as Liszt and Wagner. Fauré was a composer of several different genres of music including chamber music, music for plays, and solo pieces for both instruments and voice. Fauré's solo vocal music contains elegance, challenging accompaniment, and lilting melody lines.

Lee Hoiby (1926-2011)

Lee Hoiby, an American composer of the modern era, was born in Madison, Wisconsin, in 1926. As a child, he showed such promise as a pianist and was a piano prodigy. He was highly influenced by the impressionistic music of the age. This influence is present in his art songs which frequently feature sections of bitonality between the piano and vocal lines. Much of Hoiby's inspiration is drawn from great composers of the past such as Franz Schubert. Over the course of his life, Hoiby composed pieces mainly for the vocal arts including oratorios, song cycles and choral works. He is most well known for his opera and other lyric theater works. Hoiby has contributed over 100 art songs. Several of these were performed by legendary singers such as Leontyne Price, who made these pieces popular to the public. Hoiby's art songs are introspective and emotional works that truly access the human experience and make it explicit.
