Leoš Janáček - Sonata for Violin and Piano (1914; revised 1921)

Leoš Janáček was born in Moravia in 1854 amidst the growth of nationalism and political unrest. He was intensely attached to his homeland and inevitably his music reflects the folk influences of his background. Having spent most of his active life as a choirmaster, teacher, and specialist in the ethnomusicology of Moravia, he also developed a keen interest in speech patterns and voice inflections as dictated by the context. His study eventually led him to a theory of speech-melody; as a result, pitch fluctuations of words and sentences are a part of his musical lines.

Janáček’s recognition as a composer came quite late. In his 60s, and already partially in retirement, the productions of his opera Janufa in Prague and Vienna finally put him on the international map. The general style of his works is that the most intensely felt psychological interior is portrayed with extreme vividness. At times, the emotions are raw, hair-raising and excruciating; at other times, tragic, tender and despondent. While one might call his music disturbed and mad, another would re-cast it as severely honest in confronting the pains and fears of human life.

The Violin Sonata, one of Janáček’s most popular instrumental works, was first sketched in 1914 and finally completed in 1921, after numerous revisions. A four-movement work, it alludes to the violence and the unsettling circumstances of World War I.

The first movement, Con moto, opens boldly with an introductory violin solo which is almost immediately followed by the first theme. Throughout the movement, fragmentary and cryptic motives intertwine with longer phrases. As the movement nears the end, tension builds up but finally it concludes, surprisingly peacefully, with a comfortable Db major triad.

Next, in the Ballada, the impression is one of tenderness and simplicity. The most lyrical movement of the Sonata, the notes seem to flow from one another with ease. An improvisatory, anxious episode briefly interrupts the mood towards the end of the movement, but serenity soon returns.

The Allegretto is in the form of a scherzo. In this three-part movement, the first section (which is the same material as the last section) begins with the piano playing a bouncy folk melody over a buzzing series of trills. The violin intermittently interrupts with a shrieking chromatic figure. The middle section is almost pseudo-romantic.

The final movement, Adagio, is the most rhapsodic of the Sonata. The main motif is of repetitive interruption, played ferociously in the violin, at times muted. It is a severe disruption of the poignant piano line. Interjected into the main thematic motif are two contrasting ideas. One is a sunny melody filled with hope and eagerness for life and another is what Janáček described as the majestic entrance of the Russian liberating Army into Moravia. The work ends as the main motif dynamically fades away while the ever-increasing tension of inevitable disaster scents the air.
Astor Piazzolla - Tango Études Nos. 3

Perhaps the most famous musician associated with the tango, Astor Piazzolla, was almost single-handedly responsible for taking what was once a regional folk dance and making it famous all over the world. A virtuoso on the bandoneón, a large button accordion, Piazzolla played in dance orchestras as he continued his studies. It was famed pedagogue Nadia Boulanger that convinced him to use his diverse musical abilities to revisit and revitalize the native music of his homeland. He composed extensively, performed around the world, and worked with jazz performers like Gerry Mulligan and Dizzy Gillespie (who called him “the best musician in the world today”) and classical musicians like Mstislav Rostropovich and the Kronos Quartet.

Piazzolla’s “nuevo tango” served as the basis for much of his vast catalog of music, including the set of six Tango Études, written in 1987. The Étude No. 3 features energetic dance rhythms, elaborate textures, and the illusion of more than one simultaneous melody via fast changes in register between high and low notes. A slower central section takes on an elegiac, yet sensuous, tone.

Manuel de Falla - Suite Populaire Espagnole

Manuel de Falla, one of several noted popular Spanish composers of his time, originally penned this suite of charming and deeply rhythmical short songs in 1914 for voice under the title Seven Popular Spanish Songs. He eventually collaborated with Polish violinist Paul Kochanski, who had arranged six of the songs for violin and piano. This version for violin and piano became known as Suite Populaire Espagnole, and is the best known out of the multitude of versions that have since emerged.

El paño moruno (The Moorish Cloth) is based on a famous Spanish melody. The violin version strategically utilizes sound effects such as harmonics and pizzicato to change the colors in this song. Nana is a tune borrowed from an Andalusian cradle melody that de Falla’s mother often sang to him as a child. It features a soft, soothing, melodic violin line while the piano remains almost undetectable throughout. Canción is a lively, joyous dance with a simple melody that repeats itself three times, each successive time embellishing the previous version. Polo is a type of Spanish dance in 3/8 time. The violin and piano both have complex rhythms, trading off melodic lines and ending in a flourish of bravura sound. Asturiana is a melody from Asturia, a province of Spain. The violin has a very simple, muted, melancholy harmony line over the melody of the piano. The incomplete ending is an ideal lead-in to the final, extremely lively piece. Jota is a type of dance originating in northern Spain. In triple time, it has a light, lively rhythm with strummed pizzicatos on the violin to create a castanet-like sound.
César Franck - Sonata in A Major (1886)

César Franck’s Sonata in A Major, a classic in the violin and piano sonata repertoire, is filled with beauty, excitement, imagination, poignancy, and drama. While other important works of Franck have fallen in and out of fashion in the years since his death, the Sonata in A Major has remained popular for performers and audiences alike.

Although born in Belgium, Franck spent most of his life in Paris. Hoping he would be a concert pianist, his father enrolled him in the Conservatoire of Liege in 1830. He became a fine pianist, made concert tours, and won awards, but his personality was not suited to the self-promotion necessary to build a successful career as a soloist.

Despite the reservations of his father, Franck was interested in composing from an early age but he was only able to turn to it in earnest around the time he became the organist at the Basilica of Ste. Clotilde in 1858. He remained there until his death and also served, from 1872, as professor of organ at the Paris Conservatoire, where his devoted pupils included Vincent d’Indy, Henri Duparc, and Ernest Chausson.

Franck was a Romantic who succeeded in combining chromatic harmonies with the Classical style. He composed his only Sonata for violin and piano in the last decade of his life, a period of intense creativity that also saw the creation of his D Minor Symphony, the Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra and the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue for piano solo. The manuscript of the Violin Sonata was Franck’s wedding gift to the Belgian violinist Eugene Ysaÿe in September 1886, when the first performance took place. The public premiere took place three months later, performed by its dedicatee and Léontine Bordes-Pene at the Musée Moderne de Peinture in Brussels.

The sonata is in four movements alternating between slow and fast. As the first movement unfolds, so does the story, filled with unceasing melodies and a rhythmic element reminiscent of the gentle sway of a barcarolle. The second movement is a fireball of passion and energy, with the opening solo passagework on the piano one of the most challenging in the literature. Despite the fast tempos and perpetual motion, the melodic fluency remains prominent, and the great sense of urgency adds to the excitement. The third movement is a fantasy-filled self-reflection. It has a hint of self-indulgence, with a dark and clenching mood as well as an ecstatic melodic line that effectively contrasts with the peace and sense of attainment in the fourth and last movement. The flowing melody of quarter notes is immediately stated at the start of the movement by the piano, which the violin follows in a canon. The two instruments take turns in initiating the canon throughout. The sonata concludes with energetic elegance.
